"The fugitives and fugitive officials are at this point between many difficulties. Various law, royalist, imperialist, dynastic, religious and personal difficulties have to be overcome, and the movement of the fugitives will be greatly impeded by the circumstances, as mentioned above, of their having to leave their dependences and places attached to their old headquarters. As it has been said elsewhere there is no possibility of the fugitives returning to their old seats. The only opportunity they have is to escape from their former headquarters and to seek refuge in foreign countries. But if they remain here longer than necessary time, they will incur great suspicion and suspicion will rest upon them. They will be suspected of being royalists and imperialists, and this will bring upon them the heavy punishment of the law. If they do escape from their former headquarters, the only place left which they can go to is England. There may also exist difficulties in finding a safe refuge, especially when they are compelled to leave their old headquarters and settle among people who are not sympathetic to their cause.
